ABOUT US

We turn ideas into works of art.

The basic philosophy of our studio is to create individual, aesthetically stunning solutions for our clients. In our studio, every project is an open ended enquiry, helping our clients to challenge their existing state and work towards an alternative, a desired one. We provide guidance, expertise and experience across all phases in the design process, whether indoor or outdoor. With a strong philosophy in every design we make, we make sure that the design fits the purpose. Being or living in a space with amazing details of work is always the key to cozy and fresh feelings.

In our designs, we bring characteristics of the natural world into your built spaces, such as water, greenery, and natural light, or elements like wood and stone. Encouraging the use of natural systems and processes in our designs allows for exposure to nature, and in turn, these design approaches improve health and wellbeing.

Advice for stirring your online community and fostering engagement

by Craig David

July, 26

When you enter into any new area of science, you almost always find yourself with a baffling new language of technical terms to learn before you can converse with the experts. This is certainly true in astronomy both in terms of terms that refer to the cosmos and terms that describe the tools of the trade, the most prevalent being the telescope. So to get us off of first base, let's define some of the key terms that pertain to telescopes to help you be able to talk to them more intelligently.

The first area of specialization in telescopes has to do with the types of telescopes people use. The three designs of telescopes that most people use are the Refractor, the Reflector and the Schmidt Cassegrain telescope.

The refractor telescope uses a convex lens to focus the light on the eyepiece.

The reflector telescope has a concave lens which means it bends in. It uses mirrors to focus the image that you eventually see.

The Schmidt Cassegrain telescope uses an involved system of mirrors to capture the image you want to see.

A binocular telescope uses a set of telescopes mounted and synchronized so your view of the sky is 3-D.

Beyond the basic types, other terms refer to parts of the telescope or to the science behind how telescopes work.

Collimation is a term for how well tuned the telescope is to give you a good clear image of what you are looking at. You want your telescope to have good collimation so you are not getting a false image of the celestial body.

Aperture is a fancy word for how big the lens of your telescope is. But it's an important word because the aperture of the lens is the key to how powerful your telescope is. Magnification has nothing to do with it, its all in the aperture.
